On Thanksgiving Day in the United States, Canada.com reported that several Bell

Canada employees were caught writing "glowing" five-star reviews for the company's newly launched mobile app. According to the article, Bell Canada released this new app where customers can check data usage and account balances on Nov. 18, and initial feedback on the App Store had been less than favorable.

This could be a significant punishment for many app developers, though not as likely for a major company such as Bell Canada.

Importance of high ratings leads to bad behavior

Just as good ratings and reviews on websites such as Yelp are crucial to many businesses today, so too can App Store ratings be for companies with apps (especially) Tj T* BT uals higher downloads.

The App Store is four years Yelp's junior, and is seeing a similar rise in popularity.

Just as Yelp reached the point a few years ago when readership became extremely high and Yelp pages began ranking very highly on Google, Apple products

(e.g. iPhones and iPads) are rather ubiquitous and the App Store is generating extremely high traffic.

Accordingly, having a popular app is important for most developers. And, as with anything else, this influences a sizable percentage of people to try to game the system and try to get a leg up on the competition. Then these bad actors begin getting caught.

What can and can't you do about negative Amazon reviews?

If the article I linked below is correct, reviews can be deleted for "ranti ng" about how bad a product is, for only mentioning bad customer service, for complaining about seller, shipping, breakage, undelivered items, etc... or for being vague, like those useless "don't waste your money" reviews
