According to Business Insider, Amazon Influencers got paid anywhere from a few dollars to about $1,500 a month. That's not much. But if you live stream on multiple platforms at the same time, create multiple videos using clips from your live streams, use affiliate links, and promote your storefront, this can easily add up.

There are several other reasons consumers use product review videos:

The Great Profitability Potential of This Initiative

It would be extremely difficult to take on YouTube by just being another clone of it. What Amazon appears to be doing is more of a death by a thousand cuts. They know that they can't take on the behemoth that is YouTube head-on, so instead, they are focusing on a specific online video niche: streaming.

The first form of this was with Amazon's video streaming service, which officially became a feature of Prime in 2011. Then it came in the form of Twitch, an online streaming platform for gamers. Amazon acquired Twitch from Justin Kan in 2014.

Twitch has been very successful and has grown to have other categories of streamers, although gamers still dominate the platform. It is now the most popular streaming platform in the world. Because of its current success, it seems that Amazon wants to expand its streaming services to another video-based niche: influencer marketing.

Amazon could use a similar functionality that Twitch has for its partner program, where a streamer is able to create an ad break during a long stream. Ad breaks allow streamers to make a little extra money while also giving them a chance to take a short break. The ads on Twitch also play when a person joins the stream late. Maybe something similar can happen in this program as well.

It might be worth it to get started in this program now, while not that many people are participating in it. This would give you the opportunity to build up a loyal audience that trusts you just in case this becomes the next big influencer money-maker. Besides, in the meanwhile, it's a little extra money and publicity on another platform without much extra effort.
