Bars give bouncers a $10 "finder's fee" for confiscating and turning in fake IDs.

Legally, it is the bouncer's job to confiscate fake IDs from underage patrons, but for some, there is an added monetary incentive to stop these faux 21-year-olds from getting into their bars.

Ald. Scott Resnick, District 8, said bars are encouraged to develop a strong relationship with the police to exchange important information about trends in fake IDs. He said this also helps bouncers know what to look for when determining the validity of an ID.

He said the police also look for ways to ensure they can find those who are successfully getting into bars with fake IDs.

To combat the number of underage drinkers entering bars, Resnick said police have been conducting "compliance checks" around the city, especially at locations notorious for offenders being present.

For underage drinkers, McCaw said police consistently respond to incidents in which patrons demand to have their confiscated IDs returned.

To help ensure execution of the city's alcohol policies, Resnick said there are different training sessions required by the city for liquor establishments.

These courses include teaching bartenders and bouncers the proper rules and regulations for handling intoxicated patrons, he said.

He said some ideas he had were to avoid mechanisms such as ID scanners to better utilize resources and to ensure those who need help during alcohol-related emergencies feel comfortable contacting authorities without the fear of consequences for being under the influence.
