What's more, filmmakers will be happy to know that you don't need to meet any type of budget requirement to be able to submit your film for consideration. However, that doesn't mean that every film that gets submitted is approved - that's still up to Amazon's discretion.

Aside from a strong synopsis, you will also need to prepare the following non-optional assets:

Trailer (optional)

Before you can upload all of your assets, you will need to create an account with Amazon Video Direct. The setup of the account requires you to create a payee profile so that Amazon can pay you for any views your film might get.

You can check the status of your submission in the Amazon Dashboard. The green button on the screenshot pictured below should show you the status of your submission. If it's not fully green, it means the review process has not been completed.

Don't hesitate to contact customer support if your title review takes more than three weeks. It will be the fastest way for you to find out why your title has not been approved. It might be that one of your assets is incorrect or that there is an error in your payee profile or account.

If your title gets approved to be on the platform, congratulations! You can now let the world know about it. Email the link to your cast and crew and they'll be happy to share it among their networks. After all, who wouldn't like to tell the world that something they worked on is now on one of the largest on-demand networks in the world?
